One of Hollywood’s most successful movie producers, Michael Uslan may be most famous for the modern Batman movies, including Batman Begins, The Dark Knight Rises, Joker, and many more; but he has worked on numerous other projects, too, including Disney’s National Treasure and the children’s educational show Where on Earth Is Carmen Sandiego?, for which he received an Emmy Award.

In 1971, while still an undergraduate at IU, he persuaded the College of Arts and Sciences to let him teach the first accredited college course on comics. His generous donations of comics and personal papers to IU’s Lilly Library of rare books and manuscripts have been featured in a major exhibition (“Comic Books as Cultural Mythology”) and remain accessible through the library. He is the author of more than 25 books; his sequel to his memoir, The Boy Who Loved Batman, is due out in 2022.

He credits his undergraduate, graduate, and law degrees from IU with providing the foundation for his amazing career in the entertainment industry and retains his close connection to IU and its students as a Professor of Practice in The Media School. He also co-teaches an online course for The Smithsonian Institution.
